the Yunnan Expedition. There is, however, a growing conviction that some change is impending, some new rising imminent. It should prove to be the case, it will be due to the conceit, corruption, and treachery of the officials. They have heaped up the burdens of the people until they cannot bear them; they have exasperated foreigners by their double dealing and arrogance until the limit of their patience and endurance has at last been well-nigh reached.

New profits are constantly being afforded of the desirability of the formal annexation of Penak by the British Government. The little war in which we have been involved by the treachery and bad faith of the native chiefs has cost a goodly sum of money and many valuable lives. The only prospect of recovering the monetary outlay is by incorporating this fine strip of territory in the British possessions, and placing it under the government of the Straits Settlements. It belongs to England by right of conquest—a very good right when there is no native prince claimant worthy or capable of ruling the country. It is expedient, in British interests, that it should be annexed, in order to prevent the recurrence of difficulties which will necessitate a renewal of hostilities and further expenditure of blood and treasure.

It is strongly to be desired, moreover, in the interests of the natives, so shamefully oppressed by their chiefs, who have never shown the smallest interest in their welfare, and have systematically plundered them. To such an extent, indeed, has the system of "ageezing" been carried out that every particle of energy has been effectually crushed out of the people, and they have ceased for a long time to cultivate or engage in any industry beyond what will suffice to procure them a bare subsistence. No wonder they have acquired a reputation for sloth. The annexation of the subjunct districts is necessary also for the preservation of law and order. There will be no sense of security, no settling down to peaceful pursuits while the future fate of the country is undecided, or left in the hands of native chiefs. The Chinese settlers would soon engage in planting and mining, and at present they labour under a sense of insecurity, and the resources of the province stand idle.

Government decides on retaining the prize which has legitimately fallen into its hands. One great difficulty seems to be the cost which would be entailed by garrisoning it. The question is whether or not this might not be partly effected by raising a Chinese contingent. There are some serious objections to this proposal, no doubt; but it is certainly worth consideration. It would not be advisable to employ a very large Chinese force, but they might serve as useful auxiliaries and lighten the expense in some degree. But whatever course is resolved upon in connection with this part of the question, there is no doubt that, sooner or later, the policy of annexation will command itself to the judgment of the British Government. We only hope that it will not wait for the convincing argument of another outbreak.
